Tomorrow, at Dawn is a story that traces one evening in the life of the protagonist as he wanders through London. The night takes many strange turns, leading him to go on a pub crawl, help his friend bury his dead dog and buy weed from dealers in Shoreditch whilst watching “Lawrence of Arabia.” Many of the incidents were inspired by real people and places throughout London, that were odd enough to be included in the story. Throughout his journey, the narrator relates his experiences to his absent ex-girlfriend and all the while, he attempts to process the pain caused by the end of the relationship.

The title of the story was taken from the title of Victor Hugo’s poem, “Demain, des l’aube,” which the poet wrote in the wake of his daughter’s death.
