The Black Sea and the Caspian Sea were connected, both extending further north into the Euxine into Bessarabia, and the Caspian into the Ural and Volga basins). The Bosphorus and Hellespont mark roughly the direction of a great river which carried off the water of this Ponto-Caspian Sea. The northern part of the Aegean, to the southern Cyclades, was then land, through which this river flowed. It is supposed that its course is marked by the straits between Euboea and Andros, and that it reached the sea between the Peloponnesus and the Cyclades. The beginning of the change was the intrusion northward of the Aegean (= southern half of our Aegean), gradually cutting off "North Aegaeis" (as Dr. Philippson has proposed to call the hypothetical land corresponding to the northern half of our Aegean) from Asia Minor, but leaving the Cyclades attached to Greece, which would then have been of three times its present size. The further changes would have been posterior to the ice-age, and to the appearance of "European man" upon the scene. See F. Ratzel, in the Berichte der kbn. sachs.
